After Firing, Rostow Gets Advisory Post on Foreign Intelligence

Associated Press

Eugene V. Rostow was named to a White House advisory board yesterday, two days after President Reagan fired him as the government's arms control chief.

Rostow will become a member of the Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board that studies operations of intelligence agencies and recommends improvements.

The appointment comes on the heels of Rostow's resignation under pressure as director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. In resigning, Rostow offered to undertake other work for the administration. Reagan said Rostow would be asked to provide counsel in another position.
